Excerpt: . the blues were on one side and half on the other, and vice versa of the reds, the parties shouting and halloing, men on horseback and women as much excited as the men. When the die is cast the winners take their prizes and leave for home. Sometimes a race was run between two persons, champions, from three to five miles, and the amount staked reached $500 worth of livestock and dry goods. In these races, men and women who had large stakes, as their favorite racer lagged, ran after him, hooting and prodding with a sharp stick, so intense was the excitement. There was one advantage which these Indians had over horse racers of this day. Although the excitement was great and betting strong, and the gambling dissipating to morals, there was so far as we know, no drinking. The word Aw-op,...
