Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: .tasks the children do are only of true avail when they bring them into sympathy with the great army of workers, and imbue them with a desire to do for others. They must feel respect for the task well done; and, with an appreciation for good work, there should be ever present the desire to attain a high ideal. The teacher, in order to arrange her plans properly, should acquaint herself with the other work of the children s school life. She cannot succeed, while sewing stands by itself, as a separate part thereof. Her work must be an integral part of art, history, literature, etc. The textiles will aid her in. this correlation. By arousing the interest in their history and development she will broaden the interest of her classes. With respect to the course of work, it has been found by experience that for the little ones simple home articles, such as needle-books, pen-wipers, covers, dolls clothes; things for play, such as ball-covers, flags, sails, etc., call out his hearty will. It is only in higher grades that the more technical work may safely begin, but even here it is better to have some complete article as the object rather than models alone. Before closing this brief outline of sewing as an educative force, it may not be amiss to say a word with regard to it as a possibility in schools where the means are small. Its introduction as a course of study...
